165 Hour Interview

ALL Managers make hiring mistakes. It's harder to get hired into Google than to be accepted into Harvard. But even Google admits almost half of their hires are mistakes. When an interviewee walks into the room, the interviewer has already reviewed their resume and determined a technical fit. The next ten seconds seals it. The first impression slants the remainder of the initial interview with confirmation bias. But work merit can't be determined in ten seconds or even a fully unbiased hour. And the cost of those mistakes adds up quickly. A truly bad hire may be fired, but a mediocre hire just keeps costing you money.

We resolved the 10-second problem by adding 165 hours to it. The process is based on every other mistake you've ever made. Spill milk? You can either leave it or clean it up. The 165-hour process teaches you to clean up after your mistakes and move on.

- Maximize your positive impact.
- Leave with real life, practical ways to pursue the next best version of you.
- Be empowered in your practical pursuit of extraordinary leadership.

Trust can be our biggest expense or greatest asset. For the trusted brand, people pay more, come back and tell others. The trusted leader is followed and the trusted salesperson is bought from.

We know how difficult it can be to develop and build high trust relationships and increase member satisfaction and engagement.

This session will build on the 7 Pillars of Trust introduced at Conference in 2018 and is packed with actionable tools you can apply to increase performance, build trust and grow in your leadership skills.
